

SMART
DOESN'T SELL.
SPECIFIC DOES.

"I know what I'm doing. I have the certifications, the results, the experience. So why is no one booking?"

"Wait, what do you do again?"

"I help people transform their lives 🙏"

"Cool... 👍"

THE TRAP

You're not under-qualified. You're under-described.

You think the answer is one more credential, one more case study, one more course. It is not. The buyer in front of you cannot repeat what you do — and a buyer who cannot repeat you cannot refer you, cannot remember you, and will not hire you. Smart is what got you in the room. Specific is what gets you chosen. Your bio reads like a resume. Your tagline could belong to anyone in your field. You spent ten years getting good. You spent zero seconds becoming describable.

THE REFRAME

You don't have a credibility gap.
You have a sentence gap.

SMART & FORGETTABLE

"Certified coach helping ambitious professionals reach their full potential through holistic transformation."

Sounds like everyone. Hired by no one.

SPECIFIC & HIREABLE

"I help solo therapists charging $80/hr re-package one program and hit $10K months — without adding clients."

Read once. Forwarded. Booked.

Smart sounds impressive in a bio. Specific gets repeated in a referral. The market does not pay for what you know. It pays for the one sentence a buyer can use to describe you when you are not in the room.

None of them is specificity.

Your bio lists what you studied, not who you save.

A buyer scans your bio in three seconds. If those three seconds tell them your credentials but not their pain, they scroll. Credentials prove competence. Specificity proves fit. Buyers do not hire competence — they assume it the second they decide to read you. They hire the person who described their problem more clearly than they could.

Friends still can't explain what you do.

If the people closest to you cannot summarize your work in one sentence after a year of watching, no stranger will after one swipe. The referral economy runs on repeatability. The describable expert eats. The brilliant-but-vague expert waits. You are not unknown. You are unrepeatable.

You keep dropping price to win deals.

Generic experts compete on price because nothing else separates them. Specific experts set price because nothing else replaces them. When your work feels interchangeable, the only lever left is cheaper. The fastest way out of the price war is not better selling — it is sharper positioning that makes you the only obvious answer for a specific person.

You get compliments. Not calls.

"This is so good!" is the most expensive feedback in your career. It feels like progress. It pays nothing. Smart content earns applause. Specific content earns DMs. If your work

THE COMPARISON

Smart positioning vs. Specific positioning

SIGNAL	SMART	SPECIFIC
Describes	Your field	Your buyer
Sounds like	"I help people..."	"I help [who] hit [what]..."
Buyer thinks	"Cool, what else?"	"That's me."
Pricing power	Negotiated down	Set by you
Referral rate	Rare	Compounding

Get describable. Get hired.

1

Replace your "I help people" line.

If your tagline could describe ten other coaches, therapists, or consultants in your category, it is not positioning — it is filler. Rewrite it as: "I help [specific who] hit [specific outcome] without [specific resistance]." If you can't fill in the brackets, your problem isn't visibility. Your problem is that you haven't decided who you actually serve.

2

Run the friend test on every post.

Send your last three posts to a friend and ask: "Based on these, who do you think I work with and what do I deliver?" If they can't answer in one sentence, your content is teaching strangers nothing about you. Smart content informs. Specific content positions. Until your work makes the casual reader instantly place you, no algorithm will save you.

3

Name one buyer you will not serve.

Specific positioning is built on subtraction, not addition. The fastest way to become hireable to your real buyer is to publicly disqualify the wrong one. Write the sentence: "This is not for [type] who wants [thing]." That single line will scare off the time-wasters and signal to your right buyer that you actually understand them.

PRO TIP

If your positioning sentence makes everyone comfortable, it is positioning no one. The market does not pay for "for everyone." It pays for "finally, someone built this for me."

@SAMTRABULSI

Stop being smart. Start being specific.

Smart is the price of entry. Specific is what gets you hired. Pick a buyer. Name a result. Subtract everyone else. The expert who can be described in one sentence beats the expert who can't, every single time.
