Being a generalist doesn't keep your options open.

It keeps you broke.

You offer everything to feel safe.

The market sees nothing to hire you for.

Fifteen skills on a page.
Zero of them remembered.

A wide net catches nothing premium.

A sharp corner attracts the exact client you want to work with.

Flexibility is not a strategy.
It is a hiding place.

Why generalists stay broke:

- You compete on price, not position
- Your bio reads like a resume, not a diagnosis
- You chase trends instead of owning one problem
- You say yes to every client type that pays

Generalist:
"I help busy professionals."

Specialist:
"I help burnt-out therapists
build a weekly retainer model."

One is a shrug.
One is a hire.

Name the problem you own.
Name the person you save.
Repeat it until the market quotes you.

That is positioning.
That is how you stop being broke.
