

YOU'RE LOSING THE SALE AT "HERE'S WHAT I DO."

"I help coaches with mindset, sales, and 1:1 strategy calls."

"Cool, but what is it you actually do?"

"Like I said — coaching."

"Right. But what do I get?"

THE TRAP

Activities don't sell. Outcomes do.

The moment you describe what you do, the buyer files you under "vendor" instead of "answer".

EXPLAINING

"I help with X, Y, and Z."

CLAIMING

"I help [WHO] go from [BAD] to [BETTER]."

THE REFRAME

Same expertise. Two openings.

Buyers don't pay for the work. They pay for the wreck the work prevents and the version of themselves they walk into after.

FOUR SIGNS YOUR POSITIONING IS STILL ABOUT YOU

If three of these are yours, you're explaining when you should be claiming.

Your bio is a list of services

Anyone scanning it has to do the work of figuring out if you apply to them. They won't.

Discovery calls feel like interviews

You're being grilled because they can't tell what you're selling them. Clarity ends interrogation.

"Let me know when you have time"

Translation: I don't know what I'm buying, or why now. Vague positioning produces vague replies.

You quote your hourly rate

The hourly conversation only happens when the buyer hasn't bought the outcome yet.

THE COMPARISON

Explaining vs. claiming

SIGNAL	EXPLAINING	CLAIMING
Opens with	"I'm a..."	"I help [WHO]..."
Sells	Hours, sessions, packages	Outcomes, transformations
Buyer thinks	"How does this work?"	"Where do I sign?"
Pricing tone	Defensive	Confident
Sales cycle	Long, full of objections	Short, full of decisions

DO THIS WEEK

Stop explaining. Start claiming. Three moves.

- 1 Audit your bio
Cross out every line that describes activities. Keep only the lines about outcomes.
- 2 Write the outcome sentence
"I help [specific WHO] go from [BAD state] to [BETTER state] without [PAIN]." One line. No fluff.
- 3 Test on three past clients
Ask: "If this was the first thing you saw, would you have booked faster?" Adjust until the answer is yes.

PRO TIP

If your one-liner could describe ten other people, it isn't positioning. It's noise with your face on it.

@SAMTRABULSI

Stop describing. Start claiming.

Outcomes book calls. Activities lose them.
